The proposed research aims to examine Turkish immigrants’ views about their own socio-economic, political and cultural position in North Cyprus, their attitudes to the Turkish Cypriot natives and TRNC government, and their relations with Turkey. Particularly, we will focus on their perception of identity and practices of citizenship rights. Turkish immigrants who migrated to North Cyprus after 1975 Turkish intervention constitute more than one fourth of the total population. They suffer both social and political exclusion. Their low-status position seems to be the main ingredient in determining their socio-economic position and identity in the society. Here lies the proposed research’s basic question: to what extent their socio-economic position determines their perception of TRNC citizenship and Turkish citizenship or their own identification? In this sense, their exercise of TRNC citizenship rights and their expectations from both TRNC and Turkey will be analyzed. And also their feelings of attachment to both the home and the host countries together with previous and present ways of life will be investigated. The field study will involve also identity issues.
